

Space mining, as beneficial as it is, has a very negative effects on the economy. Although the materials gained; from the space mining is helpful and can be used in the variety of situations, several obstacles must be, considered before beginning this. A few example of such obstacle would be the price to harvest and bring back these materials, the effect this would have on corporations researching this technology, and how the over abundance of materials would affect the individual cost of the material. Furthermore, one paper states how one asteroids can contain “254,582bh of platinum that would be supplied by earth-based platinum producers to the global market”( Matheson 5). This clearly shows how rare, expensive materials can quickly lose value with the harvest of one asteroid. Without a doubt, space mining can hurt a economy due to obstacles such as an abundance of resources and creating the technology to begin getting these materials.

For each type of material, there is a certain price that is based on the amount of supply there is that is available to be sold. However when you add a major abundance of said material, this would become an issue due to the material becoming very common, thus leading to a market crash. One example of this would be if humans had access to one large asteroid, which “already been identified in an asteroid worth $700 quintillion in precious heavy metals”. If indeed this asteroid was completely harvested with everything being put on the market, then this would lead to all a materials present in this asteroid dropping value to where it becomes obsolete. Wen the supply is exponentially greater than the demand, people will sell it at a much lower rate to get rid of it quicker, thus leading to a price drop.
